FU student designers presenting locally produced gift box design concepts to Faye Carr of the Co-op.

About the Co-op Keepsake Box

When it came to choosing a container to hold our gift items we wanted to make sure it was as local as our products. That's why we contacted the Sustainable Keweenaw Resource Center (SKRC) to help us find a local supplier. The SKRC suggested a partnership with Finlandia University design program and Vocational Strategies Incorporated (VSI). Employing student designers to design a concept for the box, and VSI clients to manufacture it.

What's the difference between Ethically Traded and Certified Fair Trade?

Ethical Trade and Fair Trade have distinct origins, but their approaches are complementary: both focus on helping make international trade work better for poor and otherwise disadvantaged people.

The Ethical Trade movement originated in the 1990s when campaigns and media exposés brought attention to the harsh conditions of workers producing clothes, shoes, toys, food, and other consumables for multinational companies. Ethical Trade involves large buying companies taking a series of recognized steps to improve the conditions of the workers throughout their supply chains, wherever they are in the world.

The Fair Trade movement originated in the 1980s to protect poor developing country farmers from low international market prices of commodities such as coffee, cocoa, and tea. Products carrying the FAIR TRADE mark help address the injustice of low prices by guaranteeing that producers receive fair terms of trade and fair prices - whatever the conventional market is. Producer organizations also receive a small premium for business or social development projects.
